Will Facebook's Libra Help Bring Cryptocurrency To The Masses?

When Facebook announced plans for a stablecoin called Libra, the reaction from the cryptocurrency world ranged somewhere between skeptical and cautiously optimistic.

But, regardless of any specific merits of Facebook's version of a digital coin, the social-media giant's move could help speed the adoption of cryptocurrency to a larger audience, says Kirill Bensonoff (www.kirillbensonoff.com), a serial entrepreneur and an expert in blockchain.

"The biggest issue now is that most people are not familiar with crypto; they think it's difficult to use, and they may not trust it," Bensonoff says. "Facebook will put a digital wallet on many phones and computers, and sending payments with crypto will become commonplace."

Facebook's Libra is proposed as a stablecoin, which is a form of cryptocurrency. Using Libra, people would be able to buy things or send money to others while paying, at most, minor fees. Unlike other cryptocurrencies such as Bitcoin, the value of stablecoins is tied to an asset such as gold, the U.S. dollar, the Euro or other currencies.

Facebook won't have complete control of Libra. It's just part of a bigger group of partners that's creating the stablecoin.

What might all this mean for the future of cryptocurrencies - and for the average person who still knows little about them? Bensonoff says a few things worth knowing about Libra in particular and stablecoins in general include:

Bringing stability to cryptocurrency. As the name implies, the idea of stablecoins is to bring more stability - and more peace of mind for wary investors - to the world of cryptocurrency. "I don't think Facebook will bring stability immediately," Bensonoff says. "I believe it's going to take a lot more in terms of mass adoption, but Libra could be a step in the right direction."

The SEC's view. Regulators at the Securities and Exchange Commission have been eyeing stablecoins with the possibility that some of them could be classified as securities. "That could put stablecoins in the same category as stocks, subject to the registration, disclosures, and accreditation of investors that demands," Bensonoff says.

Will Libra replace PayPal? Maybe not, considering that PayPal is one of the founding members of Libra, Bensonoff says. "I think they will have some influence on the direction," he says. "However, crypto in general is a threat to all existing payment processors, including PayPal. I believe PayPal is smart and will adopt and accept crypto payments, and they will figure out a way to monetize it. The downside for them is they won't be able to charge nearly as much as they do now."

"I believe Libra is going to have a positive impact in terms of awareness, adoption and interest in cryptocurrency from both businesses and consumers," Bensonoff says. "But at the same time, with that could come more regulatory scrutiny."

About Kirill Bensonoff
